The wagons a score or so in number were covered with arched canvas bleached by the rains and as they stood there side by side they looked like a snowdrift against the emerald expanse of forest and foliage. The travelers saw the land of hope outspread before them a wide sweep of rolling country covered with trees and canebrake cut by streams of clear water flowing here and there and shining in the distance amid the green like threads of silver wire. All gazed keen with interest and curiosity because this unknown land was to be their home but none was more eager than Henry Ware a strong boy of fifteen who stood in front of the wagons beside the guide Tom Ross a tall lean man the color of well-tanned leather who would never let his rifle go out of his hand and who had Henry's heartfelt admiration because he knew so much about the woods and wild animals and told such strange and absorbing tales of the great wilderness that now lay before them The Young Trailers Joseph A.
