

How Are ERIC Thesaurus Descriptors Assigned?

The ERIC Thesaurus is a controlled vocabulary of subject terms (descriptors) representing research topics in the field of education. Every item in the ERIC collection is assigned descriptors by a professional indexer.

Indexers analyze each article or document to determine what it is about. They review the title, abstract, and full text (when available) and use their expert knowledge of the ERIC Thesaurus's almost 12,000 terms to select descriptors that accurately represent the subjects of the content. These descriptors are then added to the ERIC record to allow all content on the same subject to be retrieved during an ERIC search, providing the most relevant and precise results.

ERIC indexers look for specific clues that indicate a document's subject (including who, what, when, where, how, and why elements) and then use their professional judgment to assign descriptors.

Not all content is straightforward—indexers draw on their knowledge of the education field as well as of the Thesaurus to think through assigning terms.

Indexers determine the meaning behind the words an author uses to assign the most accurate descriptors possible.

This document says the research was done with "students eligible for free and reduced-price lunch" — that should be indexed as Low Income Students.

Indexers examine the document as a whole to determine which descriptors correctly and completely describe the content.

The authors mention using these same methods to teach science, but this document described research on teaching algebra to only Mathematics Instruction should be added as a descriptor.
